Dialogues on learning research integrity

For all communities, a world ever more permeated by technology and impacted by COVID-19 poses a range of new challenges and exacerbates existing ones.

How can we safely navigate facts and fiction that are competing for our attention? How can we best teach the next generation about the guiding principles of ethical research?

This Path2Integrity Collection aims to bring together all stakeholders of research integrity to learn about and co-create new approaches and methods to teach and learn research integrity and raise awareness of its importance.

We invite teachers of all education levels, curriculum developers, ethics and research integrity officers, researchers, university managers and administrators, representatives of research and education funding agencies, media and community representatives to submit manuscripts on their own experiences and works related to teaching and learning research integrity.
